Some hackers are accused of gaining access to the files and medical data of at least 11 million Americans, including the identities, dates of birth, Social Security numbers, and insurance claims of millions more. The company that provided the data, Carefirst, was hacked in a late-night cyber attack. The intruder reportedly went through a company database and collected the data of a company called MSP, which provides healthcare administrative services to employers. The incident occurred in May, yet the breach was only discovered in July. The hackers used the stolen information to send scam emails to patients, the Wall Street Journal reported. The emails contained a link to a bogus website, which stole the personal information of people who clicked on it. The emails were identified as phishing scams, designed to look like actual emails from legitimate sources like doctors or hospitals. By entering personal information on the phishing site, the hackers would be able to access the real information that's stored in a Carefirst database. "It's obviously a breach of privacy that people should be worried about," said Troy Fox, chief executive of the Information Security Policy Consortium, a trade association. "But it's also just plain stupid." Fox said that it's relatively easy to perform a phishing scam, and that Carefirst should have been more vigilant in defending their system from hackers. The company is facing a number of lawsuits, but Carefirst has declined to comment on the hack. Websites aren't the only things that are vulnerable to a cyber attack, as hackers can also find ways to gain access to credit card information and information from patient care records. In 2013, for instance, hackers obtained names, Social Security
