As we mentioned earlier, another important factor that may have made a difference in the lack of killing in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland is that people did not sit back and wait to be killed. Waiting to be killed, however, may have been just as dangerous in some situations. The fact that people kept moving to find their families and to keep their culture alive may have saved many from being killed. In some cases, however, waiting for the Germans to come might have been a better option. Also, many people survived because the Germans never considered them to be a large enough threat to try to kill as many of them as possible. In fact, both the Allies and the Germans worked together to try to save as many as they could. There are two other factors to consider. One was the lack of power in the hands of the French and the British. German planes and bombs made attacks too dangerous and too lethal to bring down the entire population and ethnic group. The other important factor was the desertion of some people from their homeland to other lands. During World War II, many people decided to stay with their families and thus became targets of the Germans. These families had to protect themselves from the Germans, and they usually were successful in doing so. Other People Watched and Did Nothing Another important factor that made the Holocaust less deadly than it might have been is the fact that people on the side of the Allies did not go to the Germans and their military and their police and tell them what they were doing. Although people in many parts of the world watched the Nazi leaders do things that were very wrong, they did little about it. Some people may have thought about what the Nazis were doing, but they didn't say a word about it. In many places, people didn't
