Andrew Cuomo recently said the "science is clear" that he is "100 percent sure" that climate change is a real threat and that it requires "action." Those sentiments were a direct response to a letter addressed to Cuomo that Republican Marc Molinaro, the current governor of New York, sent on Oct. 1. Cuomo said that he's been thinking about climate change a lot recently because of Hurricane Sandy and that he also has a "personal connection" to it. "There is no debating climate change, our air is getting warmer, our oceans are getting warmer, there is no debate about that," Cuomo told a meeting of the New York State Conservation Corps workers on Oct. 23, in a New York Times story published on Tuesday. "As the science is clear, you are absolutely right in saying that we have to act. And that is what we are doing." According to Cuomo, the risks are real, which is why it's "no excuse" for New York to say that it can't act now or any time in the near future. "The science is clear," Cuomo said. "We know what's happening and we know what the impact is. It's not a matter of debate. It's not a matter of opinion or speculation. It's a matter of fact." The NewsHour will talk about Cuomo's comments and look at the science of climate change again later this week. What do you think?
